

Jeanne Conry

Jeanne Conry, MD, PhD is the President-elect of the International Federation of Gynecology and Obstetrics. She was the 64th President of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, a membership organization representing over 57,000 OBGYNs in the USA. She Chairs the Women's Preventive Services Initiative, a United States coalition of US health professional organizations and advocates with expertise in women's health. WPSI develops, reviews and updates recommendations for preventive healthcare. She introduced the National Maternal Health Initiative to reduce maternal mortality and improve health before, during and after pregnancy. Dr. Conry leads national policy on Reproductive Health and the Environment and was awarded the Environmental Protection Agency Health Champion Award. Dr. Conry was an obstetrician gynecologist at Kaiser Permanente, the largest health maintenance organization in the United States. She currently serves as President and CEO of the Environmental Health Leadership Foundation. She received the Visionary Leadership Award from the University of California, and The United States House of Representatives honored her for accomplishments in women's health. Dr. Conry earned her medical degree and completed residency at the University of California, Davis where she served as an Associate Clinical Professor. She has a PhD in biology from the University of Colorado.