

Angie Velinor

Angie Velinor has several years of experience in healthcare provision and has an in-depth knowledge of service improvement, education and developing people.

She has worked as a midwife and held senior positions in education, leadership, clinical practice and management including: Deputy Head of Midwifery and Lead Midwife for Education at University College London Hospitals, and Better Births Workforce Clinical Lead in North Central London, as well as experience of practice and teaching in West Africa and India.

Academic roles have included Honorary Lecturer and Teaching Fellow positions.

Her experience has resulted in a strategic focus and commitment to safety, quality improvement, innovation and improving women's experience of childbirth as these are key to developing maternity services that are safe, fit for purpose and meet the needs of all women and their families. She is a member of the Royal College of Midwives (RCM) Magazine Editorial Board which enables her to have an overview of maternity services across the UK and the innovative work teams do in response to the challenges they face to enable collaboration, shared learning and success.
